WHATEVER WORKS

Synopsis

Woody Allen returns to New York with an offbeat comedy about a crotchety misanthrope (Larry David) and a naïve, impressionable young runaway from the south (Evan Rachel Wood). When her uptight parents, (Patricia Clarkson and Ed Begley, Jr.) arrive to rescue her, they are quickly drawn into wildly unexpected romantic entanglements. Everyone discovers that finding love is just a combination of lucky chance and appreciating the value of WHATEVER WORKS.

After the failure of his career, his marriage, and his suicide attempt, world-class grouch Boris Yellnikoff (Larry David), spends his days insulting the small children unfortunate enough to study chess with him and irritating his still-loyal friends with his never-ending tirades about the worthlessness of absolutely everything. A former Columbia Professor and self-proclaimed genius who came close to winning a Nobel Prize for Quantum Mechanics, Boris fancies himself the only one who fully comprehends the meaningless of all human aspirations, and the pitch-black chaos of the universe. As he readily admits, Boris is not a “feel-good person.”

Boris once had a picture-perfect life. A world-renowned physicist teaching String Theory at Columbia, he was married to Jessica (Carolyn McCormick), a brilliant and beautiful, rich woman, and lived in an opulent uptown apartment. But Boris’s good fortune didn’t alleviate his perpetual feelings of despair, and one night, in the midst of an argument with Jessica, he leapt out the window. To his great disappointment, he landed on a canopy and survived. Afterwards, he divorced Jessica and moved downtown.

One night, Boris is about to enter his apartment when he is approached by a young runaway, Melody St. Ann Celestine (Evan Rachel Wood), who begs to be let into his apartment. Seeing that she is hungry and cold, he reluctantly agrees. Melody turns out to be dewy-eyed innocent from Mississippi, who takes every sarcastic comment Boris makes completely literally. Boris helpfully tells her she is a brainless twit too fragile to survive in New York, but he allows her to stay for a “few nights.” But as time passes, Melody makes herself at home, and shows no intention of moving out. She is even able to calm Boris down from one of his panic attacks, by inviting him to watch a Fred Astaire movie with her on TV. Eventually, Melody drops a bombshell: She has developed a crush on him. Boris tells her a beautiful girl like her should find somebody her own age. “You think I’m beautiful?” she asks.

Melody meets Perry (John Gallagher, Jr.), a young man who is immediately smitten with her. Although she bewilders him by parroting Boris’s doom-and-gloom philosophy, he asks her out on a date. While she’s out Perry, Boris tells his friends Joe (Michael McKean) and Leo Brockman that he hopes Perry will take Melody off his hands, but he lets it slip that he finds her more attractive than he had previously allowed. Returning to a too-quiet apartment, Boris brightens when Melody comes home. Her date was a washout; she couldn’t relate to Perry or any of his cretin friends, none of whom knew the first thing about string theory. Listening to Melody, Boris is struck by an unexpectedly pleasurable appreciation of the chance factor in life, the vast unlikelihood that the paths of two such dissimilar people would ever cross.

Boris and Melody get married and start a life that is surprisingly satisfying for both of them. He recognizes the value her cheerfulness, and she is proud to be married to a genius. But after a year, their happiness is interrupted by the sudden arrival of Melody’s strait-laced mother, Marietta (Patricia Clarkson). Marietta has come to New York to find Melody and get away from her husband, who cheated on her with her best friend. Discovering that her daughter is not only married, but wed to an eccentric curmudgeon decades older, she faints. In an effort to temper the awkwardness of the situation, Boris takes the two of them out to lunch with his friend, Leo Brockman (Conleth Hill). While at the restaurant, Marietta encounters Randy Lee James (Henry Cavill), a handsome young man who is captivated by Melody. Likewise, Brockman is bowled over by Marietta.

Brockman soon invites Marietta on a date and later, to his apartment. When she shows him some snapshots she took, he is startled by her talent: She is a naturally gifted photographer, a true artist. Marietta spends the night with him. Making love with Brockman unleashes Marietta sexually and artistically. Soon she is freely exploring her sexuality and blossoming as a boundary-pushing photographer. Eventually she settles into a ménage à trois with Brockman and her gallery owner, Al Morgenstern (Olek Krupa).

Marietta arranges for Randy Lee James to turn up at a flea market where she will be shopping with her daughter. Buying Melody a handkerchief, Randy explains that he's an actor who lives on a houseboat, plays the flute, and who fell in love with her at first sight. Melody brushes him off, saying she's a married woman, but she holds onto the handkerchief.

Melody finally reacts to one of Boris's rants by telling him he's like a child who throws a tantrum when can't get his way. Boris is flabbergasted that Melody can have insight of her own and think for herself.

Marietta orchestrates a second "chance meeting" between Melody and Randy. This time it is successful and the two of them end up making love on his boat.

Melody and Boris are jolted by the unexpected arrival of her father, John (Ed Begley, Jr.), who is determined to bring his daughter and wife home. Ignoring Melody and Boris's warnings that Marietta has moved on and is not the woman she used to be, John insists on being taken to his wife immediately. Arriving in the middle of one of Marietta's gallery openings, John is stunned by the extent of his wife's transformation, and devastated by her rejection.

Trying her hardest to be kind, Melody tells Boris that she met someone else and has fallen in love. As cruel as life may be, she says she misses participating in it. Boris responds frostily, saying her leaving him doesn't run counter to his beliefs: If the universe is winding down, why shouldn't they?

That night, as John nurses his sadness in a bar, he gets into a conversation with another heartbroken man, Howard Cummings, née Kaminsky (Christopher Evan Welch). John is bewildered when he discovers that the wife that abandoned Howard is named Norman. Still, as their heart-to-heart continues, and John's tongue is loosened by alcohol, he admits that he never really had a passion for his wife and remembers that back in high school he had a feeling for the tight end on the football team. Cummings (née Kaminsky) orders another round.

Despondent without Melody, Boris decides to end it all and jumps out the window. Through a random and capricious trick of fate, he lands on top of a woman, cushioning his fall and sending her to the hospital. Visiting the woman, Helena (Jessica Hecht), in the hospital, Boris discovers she doesn't suffer fools gladly any more than he does. What's more, Helena is a psychic. "How come you didn't know I would fall on you?" Boris asks her. "Maybe I did," she responds.

As the romantic partners in this story uncouple and realign, seeking the emotional configurations that fulfill their needs, the outcomes suggest that there are no rules for love, and everyone must learn to be flexible and realistic. However out of the ordinary a relationship might be, it's whatever works to get you through life.

WHATEVER WORKS

About the Production

While it's hard to imagine that anyone but Larry David could have portrayed Manhattan misanthrope Boris Yellnikoff, the lead role in WHATEVER WORKS was actually written for Zero Mostel. Woody Allen set the script aside after Mostel's death, but recently, remembering it as a funny idea, decided to revive it. But he was well aware that Mostel's shoes were extra-large ones to step into. "I was thinking of who could play this who has enough humor and size as a character, and I thought Larry would be fun," says Allen. "I'm a fan of his and he's been in two movies of mine before [RADIO DAYS and NEW YORK STORIES], albeit in tiny parts."

David's debut with Allen was not particularly auspicious. "After I did my little scene in RADIO DAYS, I didn't see any cameras, so I turned to someone on the crew, and asked, 'Where is the camera?' And he pointed up, way up on the roof. And then, when I saw the movie, all I could see was my bald head."

When the production inquired about his availability to play Boris, David assumed he was being offered another small role. "I opened up the script and I saw there was the character of Boris plastered all over the first page," says David. "And then, just out of curiosity I flipped open the script to page 50—and there was Boris again. And then I went to the final page and Boris was on the final page too. And then I realized, 'Oh man, this is quite a part I have here.'"

While most actors would be thrilled to be offered the lead role in a Woody Allen film, David had a very different reaction. "I thought Woody had become unhinged," he says. "I wondered who put this crackpot idea in his head. And of course as with anything I've ever been offered, I didn't feel up to the task. Feeling up to the task is not my thing." Reading the three-page monologue that opens the film was particularly daunting. "On 'Curb Your Enthusiasm,' I never memorize anything," he says. "In fact, most of the time I don't even know what I'm shooting until a minute before. So this is quite a departure for me."

"Larry kept complaining to me what a mistake I was making by hiring him," says Allen, "telling me what a tiny range he has, how terrible he is, and all that. And then right out of the box, first take all the time, he was just wonderful, a natural actor. And what surprised me was how fine he was in the scenes that didn't require him to be funny, but required genuine acting. But being funny is sort of built into Larry, he just has it. He doesn't have to push it, he just has to show up and perform the scenes credibly, without trying to be funny, just trying to be real. When Larry's real, he's funny—because he's funny in life."

The character of Boris is a world-class misanthrope, with a high opinion of himself and a low opinion of the human race. As outrageous as his words can be, they don't wander far from statements Woody Allen has made in the past. "I wrote the script, so of course it is the way I see things," says Allen. "But Boris is a character I created. He doesn't express me exactly—he's an extreme exaggeration of my feelings."

David believes that much of Boris's pessimism stems from his atheism. "How can anyone be optimistic with death looming and no belief in the hereafter? He's also a physicist who thinks the planet's going to explode—so his glass isn't exactly half full. Also, it must be frustrating being smarter than everyone else, because no one understands you." Still, it can't be said that Boris is guilty of prejudice. "Boris treats everybody the same, which is to say, terribly," says David. "To him, most people are imbeciles. To me too, except of course, anybody who likes me."

Allen's original title for ANNIE HALL was "Anhedonia," a term for someone who is unable to feel pleasure, and Boris could be seen as someone who suffers from that malady. David doesn't agree. "There are some things he enjoys," he says. "He enjoys insulting people. He loves classical music, old movies, and knishes. But most of the pleasure in life he gets from expressing himself: he loves pontificating and showing off how brilliant he is."

While there are certainly similarities between Boris and the Larry David character that David plays on his hit HBO series "Curb Your Enthusiasm," but they are "Both of them enjoy confrontations and aren't shy about expressing their opinions," says David, "but 'Curb Larry' usually needs a reason to insult someone, whereas Boris is much more indiscriminate about it." He continues, "The guy on 'Curb' isn't as smart as Boris, but he has a better disposition, and seems to get a little bit more out of life. And he has the same needs as normal people, like love and sex, which Boris doesn't seem to have."

Abandoning his life as an eminent physicist with a beautiful wife and a fancy uptown apartment, Boris moves downtown into a dingy oasis that better suits his needs for solitude and despair. But his darkness is upended by the arrival of a ball of sunshine, in the form of Melody, a teenage runaway from Mississippi, played by rising star Evan Rachel Wood (THE WRESTLER). "Melody doesn't have a bad bone in her body," says Wood. "She's incredibly sweet and generous, and tries so hard to please people and seem smart to Boris. She's dumb as a rock, but that's what is so endearing about her." Since her years as a child actor, Wood has often played roles that are often described as "wise beyond her years," such as THIRTEEN, and Melody is a definite departure. "I'm not a genius or anything," says Wood, "but it was actually harder to play dumb. But it was much more fun—I got to make an ass out of myself, which everybody's entitled to do once."

It's no surprise that Boris, with his antipathy to everyone, would not be thrilled by Melody's arrival. "He certainly doesn't seem to want her there at first," says David. "He's kind of set in his ways. But I don't care who you are, no one's throwing her out so fast—not even Boris. That insane he's not." Still, Boris misses no opportunity to call her a brainless twit and otherwise put Melody down. Despite all this, she gradually becomes infatuated with him. "She's a lonely character in a lonely town," says Allen. "And here's a guy who takes her in and gives her a home and a bed and food, and doesn't take advantage of her in any way. Also, she recognizes that he is indeed a genius and that's very flattering to her, because she has such low self-esteem." Wood sees lots of reasons why Boris, with all his rudeness and eccentric phobias, might appeal to Melody. "I'm sure that she doesn't even understand half the insults he's giving her, and that makes it a little easier to bear," she says. "And as dumb as she is, she's good at reading people. I think she knows he has a good heart, and that it's more of a defense mechanism for him. Boris is like Oscar the Grouch: he's prickly but he's cuddly." And over time, Boris comes to appreciate Melody's instinct for calming his panic attacks, through music and old movies. "When he watches Fred Astaire on TV it does have a reassuring quality to it," says Allen. "It's not provocative, it's not challenging, it's not depressing—it's escapist. And it's something done very beautifully with pretty music and lovely dancing, and that is the kind of thing that would mollify him."

Patricia Clarkson, who had a supporting role Woody Allen in last year's VICKY CRISTINA BARCELONA, joins the cast as Melody's mother, Marietta, who transforms from a conservative southern housewife into a sexually freewheeling New York art star. "I was born and raised in New Orleans," says Clarkson, "and I'm deeply Southern to the core. So I know these women. But the beauty of Woody is—he's such a Yankee, but he got her humor and her sexuality just right, because he's such a great writer." Despite Marietta's startling transformation, Clarkson doesn't think her character changes as much as it might appear: "I would say she's realigned. She is a very strong, willful woman. She's unleashed physically and sexually, but not mentally so much because her convictions are very true and very real, and she's not a fickle person."

Allen liked to stage very long scenes like theatre, in long extended takes. "You need to know your lines," says Clarkson, "because Woody likes to keep going." Says Wood: "You'd think on a comedy that you'd be laughing constantly, but you actually spend most of your time trying to stay serious, otherwise you ruin everything. We would do these ten page master shots, and then nine pages into it, Larry would say something and I would just lose it and break out laughing. That didn't go over too well." Preparing for the long scenes together, the actors quickly formed tight bonds. "Larry is very understated, very sweet and simple," says Clarkson. "I know maybe you wouldn't attribute those qualities to him, but he's actually quite dreamy—and of course, hysterically funny." Wood agrees. "We had a great time. Larry and I bonded on the fact that I had never done a comedy before, so I asked for his advice; and he had never done a film where he had to memorize lines before, so would ask me for advice on that." David has high praise for his co-star. "You never feel like you're talking to a 21-year-old when you're talking to Evan. She seems so much older than that. And I've seen her in a few things, and in each one she's a completely different person. She seemed to be channeling something for this part." Clarkson and Wood slipped easily into their mother-daughter relationship. "I felt an immediate kinship with Evan," says Clarkson. "I started calling her Sweet Pea, because it's southern and it felt right. And it turned out to be exactly what her mother used to call her." David admits to being a bit bowled over by Clarkson's acting chops. "I was always struck by how she just went into this other gear when action was called. She just revved it up a couple of notches. Sometimes I would get caught up in watching her and forget I was in the scene."

Allen was a quiet presence on the set. "He is very focused, kind of reserved," says David, "but you can strike up a conversation and he can be very funny. But it's not like he's trying to make someone laugh, it's just his natural way of talking." "He can be funny on the set, but you know he's usually quite quiet," says Clarkson. "And it's simple and it either works for him or it doesn't. He's very kind too."

Allen encouraged the cast to feel free to depart from the script. "I always do that," he says. "And the actors all say, 'it's wonderful to work for someone who wants me to improvise,' but when the time comes they run right back into the lines. “He likes you to mix it up,” says Clarkson. “He’s the least precious writer I’ve ever worked with, but you want to say the words because they’re so funny.” David didn’t make use of his celebrated talent for improv in WHATEVER WORKS. “I tried to do it,” says David, “but the character is so much smarter than me that it didn’t sound right. It sounded too much like me and not enough like Boris. The other actors looked at me like I was crazy, so I dropped the whole idea.”

The title of the film speaks for itself, but in the movie it suggests a non-judgmental attitude towards the diverse choices people make to seek happiness. “As you go through life it’s a tough struggle and whatever works that doesn’t hurt anybody is fine,” says Allen. “So however bizarre a romantic relationship may be: if it works, it works. And it doesn’t have to be just about romantic relationships. It can be about one’s occupations, or one’s hobbies, or where one wants to live. If it works for you to be living by yourself on a desert island—then fine, it works. Nothing more need be said about it, and the same thing about any other aspect in life. If some utterly unconventional set-up works for you, then there’s nothing wrong with pursuing it. As long as you’re not encroaching on someone or hurting anybody, whatever works for you to get through life.”

“‘Whatever Works’ means you have to live your life, not by what society is telling us are the rules that are laid out for most people, but for whatever your drummer is telling you,” says David. “You can’t be with someone just because they’re in the right demographic, or they’re right on paper. That even if you have nothing in common with someone, something can happen when you’re with them that feels right and comfortable. This of course has never happened to me, and even if it did I would find reasons to reject it. With me it’s whatever doesn’t work.”

“What so many of the characters go through in the film is being unhappy by living a life that they think they should be living, or believe to be right,” says Wood. “They’re miserable. It’s not until they hit rock bottom, and have to build themselves back up again, they realize it’s just whatever makes you happy. You’ll always find your way. You’ll always find people like you. I think that’s what it means: whatever works, whatever makes you happy, that is how life should be.”

All the characters from the south in the film come to New York City and find whatever works for them. “Melody grows up a little bit,” says Allen. “At first she’s infatuated with Boris, but then she starts to realize his misanthropy. While often people deserve his mockery, not everybody always deserves it and he’s too extreme and ultimately it’s a hard way to live. She would be better off living with someone that’s not so afflicted by such intense feelings of pessimism and misanthropy, like Randy Lee James (Henry Cavill). So Melody is no longer the little pageant idiot that she was when she came, she’s progressed within her limitations, but she has definitely changed. Marietta had always been living a fake life with a guy who wasn’t really in love with her very much sexually and that probably colored the whole thing. And she was a victim of all those rural and ignorant prejudices that come from the lifestyle and the area that she was living in. When she gets a chance, when somebody encourages her artistic side rather than discourages it, all of a sudden she’s ready to burst into bloom. She’s an artist, and all it took was for someone to give her a chance for it all to come out. And the same with her husband John (Ed Begley, Jr.). He was a closet homosexual, and if given the chance it comes out, and he’s much happier for it.

So, actually, the picture itself is really a much more sentimental picture than the story would have you think. Because in the end the mother's happy she's found a new life, the fathers happy he's found a new life, though not with each other.”

Many of the key events of WHATEVER WORKS are driven by pure chance. People come together through pure happenstance, like being at the same restaurant or bar at the same time. This reflects Allen’s belief that luck is responsible for 90% of what occurs in our lives. “I do think that if you do your treadmill and you eat well you can make a contribution to your longevity or your health,” he says. “But it’s a small contribution. In the end you’re very much dependent on luck. One can always make a contribution of hard work and discipline, but as I said in MATCH POINT: it’s better to be lucky than good.” He continues, “You can search for the loved one in every conceivable way but it doesn’t mean anything. And then suddenly you’re crossing a street and somebody drops her package and you pick it up and start a conversation and that’s the person that you enjoy being with. And after that, there are a million things that have to fall in place correctly: you have to not get hit by a car, or not develop terminal cancer; you have to assume that your partner is lucky that way; you have to enjoy what they enjoy, and they have to enjoy what you enjoy. You get up in the morning, and all through your relationships, and for every little thing that happens all you can do is work very hard and try and influence it. But you can only do a very limited amount. The world is a very indifferent, meaningless, violent place. You can try your best to survive and be happy in it, but you need luck to do it—and a lot more luck than you think. You often hear people say, ‘I make my luck.’ But the same person who brags that he makes his luck steps out of his house, and they’re hoisting a piano above him, and it happens to break and drop on his head. Then he didn’t make his luck.”

No matter what happens to Boris, he will always be to a certain extent lonely, isolated as he is by his higher intellect. “Everyone in the movie, no matter happy, or bright, or accomplished, or perceptive they are, they all function within a certain limited realm and they’re fine,” says Allen. “But their view is earthbound and limited, and Boris’s view is not earthbound. Boris is the one who sees what the others can’t see. He is indeed a genius, because he is the only one who is able to see that there really is an audience out there. Whenever the picture is shown, even if it’s only for one person, they are being watched.”

WHATEVER WORKS

About the Cast

LARRY DAVID (Boris Yellnikoff) grew up in Sheepshead Bay, Brooklyn and attended Sheepshead Bay High School. Of his youth, he says, “I had a wonderful childhood, which is tough because it's hard to adjust to a miserable adulthood.” Not a surprising quote from a man whose alter ego came to life in the form of George Costanza on the television series, “Seinfeld,” which he co-created.

After attending the University of Maryland, David embarked on a career as a stand-up comedian in 1974. That career was peppered with odd jobs, including cab driver, bra salesman, and private chauffeur. In 1979, he moved to Los Angeles when he was hired as a writer and performer on the late night comedy series “Fridays.” The show lasted until 1982, at which point he moved back to New York and eventually landed a job as a writer for “Saturday Night Live.”

In 1983, he appeared in two films: Henry Jaglom’s “Can She Bake a Cherry Pie?” and Lawrence Turman’s “Second Thoughts”. David also first teamed with Woody Allen in 1987 to play a small role in “Radio Days” (as a “communist neighbor”) and then again in Allen’s segment of the 1989 “New York Stories” anthology (as a theatre manager).

A friend of Jerry Seinfeld since 1976 when the two were performing in comedy clubs, Seinfeld solicited David’s advice in 1988 when he was asked to develop a show for NBC. The two came up with the idea for “Seinfeld,” which debuted in 1989, and went on to become one of the most successful shows in television history. David occasionally appeared on the show, playing roles like New York Yankees owner George Steinbrenner. He was Emmy-nominated seven times for his writing on “Seinfeld”, and won in 1993 for the now classic episode “The Contest”. He also shared an Emmy that year for “Outstanding Comedy Series” (as well as sharing six other nominations). In addition, David won WGA awards for his work on “Seinfeld” in both 1994 and 1995. He left the show after serving as head writer and executive producer for seven seasons, but returned to write the series finale in 1998, two years later.

After leaving “Seinfeld” in 1996, David wrote and directed the 1998 feature, “Sour Grapes”, starring Steven Weber and Craig Bierko. In 1999, he received an “AFI Star Award” at the U.S. Comedy Arts Festival.

Also in 1999, David wrote and starred in “Larry David: Curb Your Enthusiasm,” a one-hour special for HBO, which spawned the critically acclaimed HBO series the following year. Six seasons of the show have aired on HBO between 2000 and 2007. David was nominated for a Golden Globe as Best Actor in a Musical or Comedy series three times (2003, 2005, and 2006) for his work on “Curb Your Enthusiasm”. The show also received a Golden Globe award for Best Television Series, Musical, or Comedy in 2003. In addition, “Curb” has been Emmy-nominated for Outstanding Comedy Series four times, and in 2003, David was also nominated for Lead Actor in a Comedy series. In 2006, he received a WGA award for Best Comedy Series for his writing on “Curb” and was nominated again in 2007. Currently, he’s shooting the seventh season of the show, slated to air in the fall of 2009.

EVAN RACHEL WOOD (Melody) has recently been acclaimed for her powerful performance as Stephanie, Mickey Rourke’s estranged daughter in Darren Aronofsky’s THE WRESTLER. A working actress since she was five, Wood had her breakout role in 2003 with Catherine Hardwicke’s controversial independent film, THIRTEEN (2003), for which she was nominated for a Golden Globe as Best Actress in a Drama as well as a Best Actress SAG Award. Born in Raleigh, North Carolina, Wood is the daughter of Sara Lynn Moore, actress, director and acting coach, and Ira David Wood IV, an actor, singer, theatre director and playwright. While growing up, she was active in a regional theatre called Theatre in the Park, directed by her father. She began her professional career in 1994, acting in TV movies, including "In the Best of Families: Marriage, Pride & Madness," "Search for Grace," "A Father for Charlie," and "Death in Small Doses." She also had a recurring role on the series "American Gothic."

In 1996, Wood moved with her mother to Los Angeles. After a one season role on the drama "Profiler," she was cast as a series regular on the award-winning series, "Once and Again," in which she appeared for four seasons. Her first major screen role was DIGGING TO CHINA, with Kevin Bacon, followed by PRACTICAL MAGIC, with Sandra Bullock and Nicole Kidman. In 2002, she made her teenage debut as a leading film actress in LITTLE SECRETS, and played a supporting role in the sci-fi drama, "S1m0ne," starring Al Pacino. The following year, in addition to her role in THIRTEEN, Wood played the kidnapped daughter of Cate Blanchett and Tommy Lee Jones in Ron Howard's MISSING. Her subsequent films include THE UPSIDE OF ANGER, PRETTY PERSUASION (2005 Sundance Grand Jury Prize winner), DOWN IN THE VALLEY, RUNNING WITH SCISSORS, and KING OF CALIFORNIA. She displayed her singing talents in 2007 with her role as Lucy in Julie Taymor's ACROSS THE UNIVERSE, set to the songs of the Beatles. She then voiced the role of an alien in BATTLE FOR TERRA, and starred opposite Uma Thurman in THE LIFE BEFORE HER EYES, before playing Stephanie in THE WRESTLER. This summer, Wood will star opposite Justin Long in a North Carolina stage production of "Romeo and Juliet." Her next film will be SUCKER PUNCH, to be directed by Zack Snyder (WATCHMEN).

Academy Award nominated and Emmy winning actress, PATRICIA CLARKSON (Marietta) has taken on roles as varied as the platform in which she plays them. Her comfort in taking on roles from motion pictures, television and the theatre has earned her great accolades and success, and has become one of today's most respected actresses in the entertainment industry. WHATEVER WORKS is her second film with Woody Allen, having previously teamed with him on VICKY CRISTINA BARCELONA. She was recently seen in ELEGY, opposite Sir Ben Kingsley, Penelope Cruz and Dennis Hopper, and MARRIED LIFE, with Chris Cooper and Pierce Brosnan. She will next be seen in Martin Scorsese's SHUTTER ISLAND, with Leonardo DiCaprio, Mark Ruffalo, and Michelle Williams, and playing the lead role in Ruba Nadda's CAIRO TIME, filmed in Egypt.
